Libraries and publishers creating new community reading scene

The Reading Agency has just issued a report on libraries' changing work with publishers. It shows that libraries are getting huge crowds for author events, launching debut authors to keen audiences and reaching people the book trade finds hard to engage.

"By working better with publishers and authors, libraries are developing really lively, appealing reading programmes for their communities. These can have a big impact on people's lives, especially in places where there's a dearth of cultural opportunities," said Miranda McKearney, Director of The Reading Agency.

The report evaluates work in 2008, the National Year of Reading, by Reading Partners, the partnership consortium which is transforming the way public libraries and adult publishers work together.

This included a huge National Year of Reading Reader Meets Writer programme with high profile authors. There were 80 events, attracting large audiences.

"It is wonderful that public libraries have become so ambitious and professional in their approach to organizing talks for authors. Warwick Library organized a magical event for Alexander McCall Smith with an audience of 550. He enjoyed it more than any other reading he did that year, which, as anyone who has ever seen McCall Smith live will know, is saying something!" Ursula McKenzie, chief executive and publisher for Little, Brown Book Group.

Other National Year of Reading activity included:

- Events targeting the Year's 'hard to reach, audiences - Redbridge Libraries' event for Bollywood star Dev Anand attracted a large Asian audience; Chris Ryan's events reached lots of men aged under 35; Louis Ferrante's events made a big impact on young offenders.
- Pairing local authors with three quarters of English library services for events, competitions and intimate sessions with reading groups. Barbara Ewing's pairing with Westminster libraries turned into a giant read-in, with all the authority's reading groups reading The Mesmerist.

On top of its National Year of Reading commitments, Reading Partners also:

- Created eleven big reading promotions for libraries' 10,000 readers groups. These included Discover Stephen King and Celebrating 25 years of Discworld.
- Produced book trailers for plasma screen in libraries.
- Created author promotions exclusive to libraries, including a celebration of James Patterson, the most-borrowed author, and a film tie-in with Revolutionary Road, promoting Richard Yates and his entire backlist.

Leading industry figures have commented on the importance of this work and shift in how libraries are working with the rest of the book trade to inspire more readers to read more.

“We love working with libraries because they share both our passion for books and our fundamental aim to get more people reading. Through the Reading Partners initiative we now have direct contact with a national network of readers. As a result, we can canvas opinion on covers, introduce new writers to an eager readership and take our big authors to an even wider audience. Libraries cultivate invaluable links with local communities, reaching a readership that is both diverse and engaged and slowly but surely, this connection is having a real impact on the way we market and publicise our books.” Jamie Hodder Williams, managing director, Hodder & Stoughton

“The Reading Agency has formed a crucial bridge between libraries and publishers by creating real opportunities to promote writers to the large community of readers who use libraries regularly. The Reading Partners initiative is now a routine part of Faber’s thinking about how to promote writers, particularly in the arenas of poetry and literary fiction. Building a grass roots readership for writers in these areas through libraries is now a vital part of our strategy.” Stephen Page, chief executive and publisher, Faber and Faber Ltd.

What next?

In 2009 Reading Partners will be:

- Developing a multi-layered author event strategy including high profile author events, low cost, local events and a programme of live literature events for ethnic minority communities.
- Introducing training to increase the number of tried and tested library venues for author events.
- Establishing an innovation task force, exploring library/publisher opportunities in the areas of digital developments and partnerships with retail.
- Embedding the new Children’s Reading Partners scheme, including launching a new national book promotion.
- Launching a toolkit with Borders, encouraging more joint work with libraries..
- Feeding into strategy developments including the government’s Library Review and the Creative Reading Charter.
- Exploring links with Reading For Life, the legacy campaign for the National Year of Reading.
